MALE RAPE

Information

Rape of males by males

Male rape is far more common than generally supposed, research from the UK suggests that almost 3% of men reported a non-consensual sexual experience as adults and over 5% of men reported sexual abuse as a child. This does not take into account the likelihood of under reporting. Recognition of male on male rape in law has historically been limited; the first successful prosecution for attempted male on male rape in the UK was not until 1995.

Rape of males by females

Non statutory female on male rape is widely, but incorrectly, considered impossible because male erectile response is seen as voluntary, when, in fact, it is involuntary. Fear, anger, anxiety, and non-arousal have been cited as factors in being unable to obtain an erection. Therefore, male victims of rape by females often face social, political, and legal double standards. Though studies show otherwise, female rapists are usually seen as less culpable than male rapists by the courts due to these misconceptions. Those who do not understand the law in many jurisdictions fail to realize that the forcible penetration of a male by a foreign object or a digit also constitutes the same crime. Since rape by females is much less well known than male-female rape, male victims of female rapists often find little support from support services.

Due to these reasons, and the difficulties and comparative rarity of female on male rape compared to other forms of rape, it is likely to be substantially under reported.

Women can also commit an act of rape with force or deception to make an adolescent male engage in a non consensual penetrative sexual act. This may involve their own child or children, which is incest. Several widely publicized cases of female to male
